The Golden Sweater

A STORY BY THE NEW YORK LIFE FOUNDATION

written by Edward Miller & Katy Moseley

♥ illustrated by Dermot Flynn

Kai had felt sad before...

but this was different,
something more.

One that felt like
a lifelong frown.

This was a new kind of down.

An illustration of a woman with short black hair sitting at a desk, working on a laptop. The desk has a potted plant, a lamp, and a mug. A window behind her shows a warm, golden light with falling leaves. To the right, a young boy with black hair is sitting at a desk, drawing a face on a piece of paper with a blue marker. On the wall behind him is a world map. The entire scene is set against a dark blue background with various leaves scattered around. The text is written in a white, cursive font.

Without Kai's dad,
their whole world was turned blue.

Mom didn't show it,
but she was sad too.

But this didn't mean they'd be frightened forever.

Brave sometimes hides
in the strangest of places...

for Kai...

DAD'S
THINGS

That place was a sweater.

Just when he felt
he might never be bold,

*Kai's world was changed
by a sweater of gold.*

What kind of sweater makes you brave when you're sad?

The kind that is stitched
with the love of your dad.

An illustration in a soft, painterly style. A woman with short black hair, wearing a blue long-sleeved top and dark pants, sits on a wooden chair at a table. She is looking down at a book in her hands. On the table is a blue mug. To her left is a window with white curtains, through which bright yellow light and a tree trunk are visible. The background wall has a blue and white herringbone pattern. In the foreground on the right, a large yellow sweater with a white grid pattern is draped over something. A small red heart is visible on the wall behind the sweater. The floor is dark blue with some yellow speckles.

*This sweater was special,
it gave strength and advice.*

*It even cheered up his mom
when she didn't feel nice.*

Suddenly, he realized that right from the start...

The same brave in its stitches
was stitched in his heart.

So if ever you feel life
won't get any better,

Remember,
brave is born from
the strangest of places...

Sometimes, that place
is a golden sweater.

Strength comes in many forms,
you can be one of them.

Since our founding in 1979, the New York Life Foundation has provided more than $400 million in charitable contributions across the U.S. in programs that benefit young people.

Recognizing the critical need to provide greater support to grieving children and their families, the New York Life Foundation established childhood bereavement as a funding focus area in 2008 and has worked to increase research, expand services and bring greater attention to this critical yet under-resourced area.

from Kai's Mom

- ♥ When explaining death to children it's better to use clear and explicit words. Phrases such as "passed" or "passed on" or "gone away" may be easier to say for an adult but can confuse children. Say "death" and "died."
- ♥ Often children and adults keep something special that belonged to a loved one—like a sweater or hat. This is a healthy part of a child's grieving. It helps them feel connected to the person they lost.
- ♥ You will be grieving too. It's important to let your children see what you are feeling and to talk about how natural it is. It's ok for them to see you cry, talk with friends, and share happy or sad memories of your loved one. Take care of yourself so you can take care of your family.

from Kai

- ♥ Talking about your loss can be hard. Very hard. But it's important. Just as I connected with my Mom, you can talk to an adult, brother or sister, a close friend or even a new friend who has also lost someone important in their lives.
- ♥ There are many things that remind you of your loved one—a photo, a blanket, or even something they wore. Like my dad's sweater. Keeping these things close to you can give you comfort and keeps their memories alive as you grow older.
- ♥ I loved to play tennis with my dad. Did you have a special activity you shared with your loved one? Maybe it was a sport, game, biking or playing music. These activities will help you keep memories strong and can be another source of comfort for you.
